2. fig. A petty annoyance, a minute irritation.

Policy of pin-pricks, a course of petty hostilities maintained as a national or party policy: applied first in Nov. 1898 to the policy attributed to France in reference to the conflicting colonial interests of France and Great Britain.

The French use of a corresponding phrase comp. d'épingle, 'pin-stroke', goes back some centuries, in Eng. 'pin-pricks' is found in political use in 1885. On 8 Nov. 1898 the French journal Le Matin deprecated a 'politique des richesses à l'Angleterre', and 'de continuelles piqûres d'épingle'; on 16 Nov. The Times, referring to this article, used the words 'a policy of "pinpricks"': Le Temps of 19 Nov. (publ. evening of 18th) had an article denying on the part of France the existence of a 'politique de coups d'épingle'; The Times of 19 Nov. quoted this as a 'policy of pin-pricks' (see quot.), which forthwith became a political phrase.

6. Arch. The inclination of a sloping roof, or of the rafters, to the horizontal; the steepness of slope of a roof, the proportion of the height of a roof to its span.

1703 Moxon Mech. Exerc. 147 The Reasons for several Pitches, you may find among Books of Architecture. Ibid. 163 The Angle a Gable-end is set to, is called the Pitch of the Gable end. 1770 J. HARRIS Lex. Techn. II s. v., If the Length of each Rafter be $\frac{1}{2}$ of the Breadth of the Building, then they say that the Roof is of a True Pitch. But if the Rafters are longer, they say 'tis a high or sharp pitch'd Roof, if shorter, they call it a low or flat pitch'd Roof. 1828 Hutton Course Math. II 87 When the roof is of a true pitch, that is, forming a right angle at top; then the breadth of the building, with its half added, is the girt over both sides nearly. 1863 D. G. MITCHELL My Farm in Edgewood 85 Walls, of the uniform height of ten feet, covered with a roof of sharp pitch. c. 1878 Sir G. G. Scott Lect. Archit. (1879) I 254 All previous styles of architecture in Southern countries, had roofs of a low pitch.

d. The slope of a flight of steps; concr. a flight of steps.

1703 Moxon Mech. Exerc. 147 You will first ascend upon a Pitch of Flyers, which Pitch (making an Angle of 38 deg. with the Floor) with ten Steps raise you six Foot high above the Floor. 1848-76 Gwilt Archit. § 2026 The framed timbers which support the steps of a staircase are called the carriage. They generally consist of two pieces inclined to the pitch of the stairs, called the rough strings.

e. The setting of a ploughshare to enable it to penetrate a required depth. f. The rake or inclination of the teeth of a saw. g. The inclination of the bit of a plane to the surface that is being planed.

1707 Mortimer Husb. (1741) I. 50 A great matter in the making of Ploughs, is to make them go true to the pitch they are set. 1787 W. MARSHALL Norfolk 48 Plowing the full depth of the soil is called 'taking it up a full pitch'. 1875 KNIGHT Dict. Mech. s. v. The pitch of a saw is the rake or inclination of the face of a tooth. The rake is a forward slant of the face, not common, but found in some saws. The common pitch of a bench-plane is 45°. Pitch of scraping and metal planes 80° to vertical. 1875 Carpentry & Join. 23 A Jack plane with its double iron lying in its bed, the latter being at an angle of 45 deg. to the sole. This is the angle called common pitch.

VII. 25. Mech. The fixed distance between successive points or lines (the distance at which these are pitched or fixed). a. The distance between the centres of any two successive teeth of a cog-wheel or pinion, or links of a gear-chain, measured along the pitch-line or pitch-circle (see 26); the distance between the successive paddles of a paddle-wheel, measured on the circle passing through their centres. b. The distance between the successive convolutions of the thread of a screw, measured in a direction parallel to the axis, and indicating the distance through which the screw moves forward in one turn. c. The distance between the centres of successive rivets or stays. d. In floor-cloth printing, The distance between the pitch-pins or guide-pins, used for the same purpose as the register-points in lithographic printing.

1815 J. SMITH Panorama Sc. & Art I. 362 If the teeth of one be wood and the other iron, then the iron ones are made to have less pitch than the wooden ones, because they are then found to wear better. 1823 R. BUCHANAN Milwaukee (ed. 2) 30 By the pitch it is understood the distance between the centres of two contiguous teeth. 1825 J. NICHOLSON Operat. Mechanic 422 The pitch of their teeth should be the same as that of the teeth of the cylinder. 1863 P. BARRY Dockyard Econ. 264 The pitch of the screw could be altered from the deck to suit the velocity of the vessel. 1869 Sir R. J. K. Shipboard xvii. 335 The question of the proper pitch of rivets, i. e. their distance apart from centre to centre, requires some consideration. 1870 Eng. Mechanic 14 Jan. 437/2 Find the pitch of the screw required to be cut, and multiply the numerators. 1874 Threemile Annual 130 The spacing or pitch of rivets required by Lloyd's rules is 'four and a half diameters apart, from centre to centre, excepting in the keel, stem, and stern post'. 1875 KNIGHT Dict. Mech. 1719/2 The pitch of the paddles is the distance between them, measured on the circle which passes through their centres. 1879 Cassell's Techn. Educ. I 64 The length in a spur wheel including a tooth and a space is called the pitch, and the circle on which such distances are set off is called the pitch circle. Ibid. II 66/2 The pitch of rifling of the Enfield is one turn in six feet six inches. 1890 Clackson News 25 Jan. 2/3 Most makers of implements now use only standard pitches of screws, so that any broken screw or missing nut can quickly be replaced. 1898 Cycling 43 The distance between the central points of two similar links, is called the pitch of the chain. It is nearly always one inch.

VIII. 26. attrib and Comb.: pitch-block, a block for supporting an object to be worked at, which can be inclined at any pitch or angle, usually one with a base working like a ball and socket-joint; pitch-chain, a chain consisting of links bolted or riveted together so as to work in the teeth of a toothed wheel; pitch-circle, a circular pitch-line (see below); so pitch-diameter, the diameter of the pitch-circle of a wheel, etc.; pitch-faced a., of masonry, having the arms cut true, but the face beyond the edge left relatively rough, being merely dressed with a pitching chisel.

[Note The form of this verb, and the fact that it has the collateral form Pick v. (chiefly, but not entirely, northern), naturally suggests some etymological connexion with Pick v. (OE. pician or pician). To this, in sense also, it stood originally in somewhat of a causal relation pick to pierce or penetrate (with something pointed), pitch to cause to penetrate, to stick (something pointed) in. But no satisfactory explanation of 'pician' as a causal derivative of pician or pician appears. And although the form pick appears in both verbs, they are formally distinct, in that Pick v. occurs with short and long i, but only with i, never e, while PITCH occurs both with -ich and -e, but never with long i. They are also quite distinct dialectally; dialects which use Pick v. for pitch, use pick for Pick v.]

b. In modern use, forming the second element in the name of a group of houses in a town or city, now or formerly possessing some of the characters (positive or negative) of a square, chiefly that of not being properly a street.

Often used in the name of a small area more or less built around, and lying aside from a street or thoroughfare, or of a short cut de-sac or byway turning out of a main thoroughfare, also, more vaguely given to a short row or 'terrace' of houses, which originally stood by themselves on a suburban road, being in fact a ready denomination for any aggregation of houses which cannot be more particularly classed.

Employed in 16th c. to render F. place and its Italian, Spanish, and German cognates, in reference to foreign towns, whence introduced in English towns (But in some cases the name 'Place' has arisen out of sense 4 b, the site being that of a nobleman's or bishop's town-residence, which bore the name, e.g. Ely Place in London)

Plaid (plā'd, plād). Also 6 plyd, playde, pladd, 6-8 plad, 7 pleid, 8 plade, (pladd), 8 (dial. g) plod. [The same word as Gael plaid, Ir. plaid blanket, ulterior etymology uncertain

The quots. clearly bespeak a Scottish origin, and even in the 16th c. associate the plaid with the Highlands, but the want of early evidence for the word in Celtic leaves it doubtful whether the name originated in Gaelic or Lowland Sc. Gaelic etymologists suggest derivation from peall sheep-skin, ad. L. pell-is, but this is phonetically improbable. The Sc. spelling plaid is now usual, although the word is very generally pronounced plad in England.]

1. A long piece of twilled woollen cloth, usually having a chequered or tartan pattern, forming the outer article of the Highland costume, and formerly worn in all parts of Scotland and the north of England, in cold or stormy weather, instead of a cloak or mantle. The Lowland 'shepherd's plaid', of a black chequer pattern on white, is commonly called a MAUD.

1. The form of vocal music believed to have been used in the Christian Church from the earliest times, consisting of melodies composed in the mediæval modes (see MODE) and in free rhythm depending on the accentuation of the words, and sung in unison; in the West it was first systematized in the 4th century by St. Ambrose, and further developed in the 6th century by St. Gregory the Great: see AMBROSIAN, GREGORIAN.

Plain-song* 1 Plain-song or Cantus planus—even, level, plain song—is perfectly distinct from cantus figuratus, or mensuralis, i.e. harmonised, measured music, from which it essentially differs in tonality and rhythm. . . In plain-song the accent occurs irregularly, thus making the rhythm free, but subject to certain laws of proportion which satisfy the ear.

There is no similarity of aspect or nature between the plane-tree and the plantain (a fact noted already by D'Acosta in 1590), so that no reason appears for a transfer of the name from the former to the latter. It has therefore been suggested that in this sense plátano was a corruption of some native name. And, in fact, the plantain or banana appears in Ant. Biet's Galibi Dictionary of 1664, and again in that of 1763, as palatana, in Raymond Breton's Caulb. Dict. of 1665 as palatana, grosses bananes, and in the Arawak lang. as prítane. But there appears to be no material for determining whether these are native words, or merely corruptions of the Spanish. The Tupi name of the fruit is pacova.]

1. A tree-like tropical herbaceous plant (Musa paradisiaca) closely allied to the Banana (M. sapientum), having immense undivided oblong leaves, and bearing its fruit, for which it is extensively cultivated, in long densely-clustered spikes.

Musa paradisiaca and M. sapientum (the Banana), if really distinct species, are very closely allied, and some of their numerous varieties are scarcely distinguishable. The names plantain and banana are also imperfectly differentiated. In the West Indies, Western Africa, etc., banana is applied to the forms with a purple-spotted stem, and a smaller and more delicate fruit, which is eaten raw; while the name plantain is given to those with larger and coarser fruit, which is cooked as a vegetable; but in India this usage is reversed, plantain being the general name; see Yule Holston-Jobson. In French, banane is the general name for both; so bananier a banana- or plantain tree.

1604 E. GRIMSTONE] D'Acosta's Hist. Indies IV. (Hakl. Soc.) I. 241 The first that shall be needefulle to treat of is the Plantain, or Plantano, as the vulgar call it. The reason why the Spaniards call it plantano (for the Indians had no such name) was, as in other trees, for that they have found some resemblance of the one with the other, even as they called some finies pines, pines, and cucumbers, being far different from those which are called by those names in Castille. 1613 G. 1. A mass or sheet of naked protoplasm, formed by the fusion, or by the aggregation, of a number of amoeboid bodies (true or fusion-plasmodium, pseudo- or aggregation-plasmodium), and having an amoeboid creeping movement.

First observed as one stage in the life-history of the Myxomycetes or Mycetozoa, the position of which as vegetable or animal organisms is disputed, also in certain groups of Protozoa, and other simple animal forms.

1875 Encycl. Brit. III. 693/a The formation of the plasmodium is a kind of complex conjugation. 1875 BENNETT & DYER Sachs' Bot. 276 Myxomycetes. The swarm spores cease dividing and unite, two or more of them coalescing—after they have gone over into the Amœba form—into a homogeneous protoplasmic substance, also endowed with an Amœba-like motion, the Plasmodium. 1875 ALLMAN in Phil. Trans. CLXV. 561, 571. 1877 HUXLEY Anat. Gen. Aulm. XXX.* 254 On the coalescence of Amœboid cells into Plasmodia. Ibid. 254 The formation of plasmodia was at first supposed to be peculiar to the Myxomycetes, but several Rhizopods have been described in which a more or less complete cell-fusion has been observed. All the evidence points to the conclusion that the power of coalescing with its fellows, under favourable circumstances, to form a plasmodium, is a very widely spread, if not a general property of the amoeboid cell. 1885 VINES Sachs' Bot. 263. 1888 *ROLLESTON & JACKSON Anim. 2. Name given to certain parasitic organisms found in the blood of patients with recent malaria, and quartan and tertian ague.

Discovered by Laveran (1880), and named by him, as a vegetable organism, Oscillaria malaria; referred by Marchiafava and Celli to the animal kingdom, and called by them (1885) Plasmodium malaria, more recently distinguished as belonging to two genera of Protozoa, Laverania and Plasmodium. (Minchin in Ray Lankester Treatise on Zoology I. II. 243 (1903).)

1895 Syd. Soc. Lex. 1897 Allbutt's Syst. Med. II. 724 Marchiafava and Celli described with great accuracy the intra-corporeal amoeboid form, to which they gave the name plasmodium. 1898 *P. Plasmogen (plæzmō'djen). Biol. [f. PLASMA + -GEN.] The chemically highest or most elaborate form, stage, or part of protoplasm, which by its vital activity forms the tissues or other organic products; true or formative protoplasm; bioplasm. 1888 E. R. LANKESCHER in Encycl. Brit. XXIV. 827/1 Physiologists have come to use the word 'protoplasm' for one of the chemical substances of which Schultze's protoplasm is a structural mixture—namely, that highest point in the chemical elaboration of the molecule which is attained within the protoplasm, and up to which some of the chemical bodies present are tending. This 'critical' substance, sometimes called 'true protoplasm', should assuredly be recognized by a distinct name 'plasmogen'.

Plasmogeny (plæzmō'djen), -gony (-gōn). Biol. [f. PLASMA + -GENY. The variant plasmogony is ad. Ger. plasmogonie (Haeckel) with suffix ger. -gonyia begetting, generation: cf. cosmogony.] Name for a mode of spontaneous generation: see quot., and cf. AUTOGENY.

1876 E. R. LANKESCHER in Haeckel's Hist. Creat. I. 339 We call spontaneous generation plasmogeny when the organism arises in an organic formative fluid, that is in a fluid which contains those requisite fundamental substances dissolved in the form of complicated and fluid combinations of carbon. 1904 McCABE in Haeckel's Wound. Life xv. 369, I distinguished two principal stages—autogeny (the formation of the first living matter from inorganic nitrogenous carbon-compounds) and plasmogeny (the formation of the first individualised plasm; the earliest organic individuals in the form of monads).

|| Plasmolysis (plæzmō'lisis). Biol. [mod. (De Vries, 1877) f. PLASMA + Gr. λύσις loosening, setting free.] Contraction of the protoplasm of a vegetable cell with separation or freeing of the lining layer from the cell-wall, due to the withdrawal of liquid by exosmosis when the cell is placed in a liquid of greater density than the cell-sap. Hence Plasmolyse (-lōiz) v. [cf. analyse], to subject to plasmolysis, cause plasmolysis in; Plasmolytic (-h'tik) a., pertaining to, showing, or causing plasmolysis.

1885 GOODALE Physiol. Bot. (1892) 390 Such substances [as cause contraction of the protoplasm] are termed plasmolytic agents. 1886 VINES Lect. Physiol. Plants III. 39 Turgid cell in 20 per cent solution, showing complete plasmolysis. Ibid. 44 When the cells of the Beet root are placed in syrup they become plasmolytic. 1888 *HUXLEY & MARTIN Elem. Plasmosome (-sōm) Biol. Also erron plasma. [f. PLASMA + Gr. σῶμα body.] 'A separate particle of protoplasm, such as certain particles observed in cell-nuclei' (Syd. Soc. Lex.).

1889 Q. J. J. Microsc. Sc. XXX. II. 168 The out wandering plasmosomes form the so-called 'paranuclei' (Nebenkerne), which take so important a share in the regeneration of cells. 1900 E. B. WILSON Cell (ed. 2) 34 The so called true nucleoli or plasmosomes.

Plasome (plæ-sōm). Biol. [a. Ger. plasma (Wiesner), shortened from his original term plasmatozom, f. Gr. πλάσμα, plasma + σῶμα body.] (See quot.)

1895 Syd. Soc. Lex., Plasome,... a term used by Bruché and Wiesner for hypothetical minute vital particles, made up of a group of protoplasmic molecules, and constituting the smallest units which can exhibit the primary vital [functions]. They correspond [to a certain extent] to Weismann's 'biophors', and to the 'pangenies' of de Vries. 1902 E. A. MINCHIN in Encycl. Brit. XXXII. 41/r In other cases the assumption of invisible protoplasmic units has been inspired by a desire... to explain the general vital and animative powers of protoplasm, as, for example, the 'micellæ' of Nägeli and the 'plasomes' of Wiesner.

Plasse (obs. form of PLACE).

Plasson (plæ-sŏn) Biol. [a. Ger. plasson (Haeckel), a. Gr. πλάσσω, -on, pres. pp. of πλάσσειν to mould, form.] Name for the homogeneous protoplasm of hypothetical primitive organisms, not yet differentiated into nucleus and general cell-substance, or for that of non-nucleated cells or cytodules.

1879 tr. Haeckel's Evol. Man I. vii. 182 The vital activities of each cell form a sum of mechanical processes, which depend radically on movements of the smallest 'life-particles', the molecules of the living substance. If we call this active substance the Plasson, and the molecules the Plastidules, we may say that the individual physiological character of each cell depends on the molecular movement of its plastidules. 1904 McCABE in Haeckel's Wound. Life vii. 183 On the first view, which I hold, the plasm, or living matter, of the earliest organisms on the earth... was a homogeneous plasson or archiplasm—that is to say, a plasma-compound that was not yet differentiated into outer cytoplasm and inner caryoplasm.

Hence Plassonity (humorous, after paneuty, etc.), the quality of being 'plasson'.

1882 COURTIS Biogen (1884) 33 The original arch amœba is as much of a mystery as ever; we know not where he came from, how he got there, or in what the essence of his plassonity subsists.

[The form plaster occurs in sense i in OE., ad. pop. L. plastrum (med. L. in Du Cange), shortened from emplastrium a plaster (medical and in grafting), a. Gr. ἐμπλαστρον (Galen), var. of ἐμπλαστον plaster, salve, f. ἐμπλαστός vbl. adj. 'daubed on or over'. Cf. OHG. pfāstar, Ger. pfāster, also from pop. L. In ME. reinforced by OF. plāstre (13th c. in Littré, but the deriv. vb. plāstir in 12th c.), mod. F. plâtre, only in branch II below (for which also mod. L. plastrum (1233) is cited by Du Cange). Thus the medical sense was from med. L., the builder's sense through French. The collateral form plāster, which has been current since 14th c., and has sometimes been more common (as a written form) than plaster, occurs also in 14th c. in OF. (plāstre), but it was not the normal OF. form even in Norman or Picard, and its history is obscure. Although still frequent in the 18th c., and found in Dr. Johnson's writings, it was not recognized by him in his Dictionary. In mod. dial. plāster (plā'ster) is the form in Sc. and north. Eng.]

Plat (plæt), sb. 3. Also (6 plate), 6-7 platt(e) [A collateral form of PLAT sb., which arose early in the 16th c., app. under the influence of PLAT sb. 2.]

The chronology appears to show that plat in sense 1 originated as a variant of PLAT sb. sense 2, assimilated to PLAT a. and sb. 2 through association of sense, a plat of ground being usually a plat or flat area. Hence also, through the notion in sense 2 of 'a plan on the flat', arose senses 3-5. But sense 1 being indifferently plat or plat, the same vacillation of form extended to these senses, so that they also varied with plat, giving rise to senses 3-6 of PLAT sb. Thus, in sense 1, plat is a variant of plat, but, in senses 2-5, plat appears to be a variant of plat. Both forms still survive in senses 1 and 2; in senses 3-5 plat has yielded to plat.

Platinum (plæ'tinəm) [mod.L., altered by Beigman (followed by Davy), from PLATINA, in conformity with the names of other metals in -um]

1. A somewhat rare metal (at first named PLATINA), of a white colour like silver but less bright, very heavy, ductile, and malleable, unaffected by all simple acids, and fusible only at an extremely high temperature; used chiefly in chemical and other scientific processes. Chemical symbol Pt.

1812 SIR H. DAVY Chem Philos 448 The ores of platinum are very rare, they have been found only in South America and in Spain. Ibid 449 Platinum was first described as a peculiar metal by Dr. Lewis, in 1754. 1827 N. ARMOTT Physics I. 10 Platinum can be drawn into wire much finer than human hair. 1832 BARBAG Econ Manuf. xiv (ed 3) 123 In Russia platinum has been employed for coin. 1838 J. L. STEPHENS Trav. Chem IV. 665 The unalterability of platinum at high temperatures, and its power of resisting the action of most chemical agents, render it extremely useful for the construction of crucibles, evaporating dishes, forceps for blowpipe experiments, etc.

2. attrib. a. Made or consisting of platinum.

1840 Penny Cycl XVI 40/1 Heated in a platinum spoon it [balsam of Peru] burns with a white smoke. 1842 PARNELL Chem. Anal (1845) 330 Heated to redness in an open platinum crucible. 1849 NOAD Electricity (ed 3) 22 The experiment was made with a platinum wire. 1899 CAGNEY tr. Jakob's Chin. Diagn. vi (ed 4) 206 A particle..of the cultivation from agar is taken on a platinum point.

1854 J. SCOFFERN in Orr's Circ Sc., Chem. 511 The substance termed 'platinum black' furnishes the metal in a condition of still more minute division. 1878 ANNEY Photogr. 157 The prints produced by this [platinum] process are exceedingly beautiful, and, as platinum black forms the image, they may be considered as being far more permanent than a silver print. 1866 WATTS Dict Chem IV. 666 All 'platinum-compounds are reduced to spongy platinum in the inner flame [of the blowpipe]. 1901 Brit Med Jnl. [OE. plegan, -can, -ian, plegan, plegan, cores], to M.Du. pleyen, pleien, pleyen to dance, leap for joy, rejoice, be glad (Verwijs and Verdam). As to its relation to OS. plegan, Du. plegen, Ger. pflegen 'to have the care of, take charge of, attend to, cultivate', 'to be in the habit of, to be wont or accustomed to', see below. The OE verb is recorded in several diverging forms, so that it is difficult to determine its original type and the conjugation to which it belonged. The usual WSax. form plegan gave ME. pleis(n), later plais(n), play; the OE plegan in Anglian texts gave the northern plawe, plaw. The 7 forms in 2-3 pleoge, pleoge, pleowe, plawwe appear to mix the two.

The primary senses under each of the following branches were already in OE, and the order of their development is more or less inferential, but all the uses of 'play' are seen to arise naturally from a primary notion 'to exercise, bestir, or busily occupy oneself', the line of development having been here determined by the recitative or divertive purpose of the exercise. In the mimer's 'play', the sense of exercise or busy occupation disappears, and the word (sense 15, cf. PLAY 20) comes to mean 'to cease work, to be idle'. The same primary notion, developed in quite a different line, accounts for the continental senses of plegen, plügen, 'to have care of, take kindly charge of, cultivate', and 'to be in the practice or habit of', notions which evidently imply occupying oneself busily about a thing or person, and habitually exercising oneself in an action.]

II 6 intr. To be pleased, to like; to have the will or desire; to have the humour; to think proper. (In sense, exactly = the passive in 4, 4 b)

The history of this inverted use of please (observed first in Scottish writers) is obscure. But exactly the same change took place in the 14th c. in the use of the synonymous verb like, where the impersonal 'it liked him', 'him liked', became 'he liked' c 1430 It may therefore be assumed that 'I please' was similarly substituted for 'it pleases me', 'me pleases' (c 1440 in 3 c) Cf also Malory's 'me ought', in alliterative Morte Arthure 'me oughte', with Wyclif's 'Y awȝte', later 'I ought' The remarkable thing in the case of please is that the sense was already logically expressed by the passive to be pleased (sense 4), and that the new idiom was therefore not needed, 'he pleases' being simply = 'it pleases him', and 'he is pleased' Shakspeare uses the three forms indifferently. Indeed, all the constructions of the vb., exc 6 c, are richly exemplified in his works see Schmidt.

(e.g. Annals of the Ogleve, Cassell) with a cross-reference to Plait. But as a spoken word it was in use in the 18th c., for Walker 1791 s. v. Plait says 'There is a corrupt pronunciation of this word, as if written plete, which must be carefully avoided'. (Good eyes on a clear night can make out about nine, while the telescope shows a great number.)

According to Greek Mythology, the Pleiades were the seven daughters of Atlas and Pleione, the eldest of whom, Electra, was 'the lost Pleiad', and not represented by a star. The seven names, with those of the parents, have since Riccioli (1665) been individually applied to the nine brightest stars, of these Alcyone is of the 3rd magnitude, Electra and Atlas of the 4th, Merope, Maia, and Taygete of the 5th, Pleione, Celeno, and Asterope, between the sixth and the seventh. Some think that the name was actually derived from πλεῖν to sail, because the season of navigation began with their heliacal rising.

Pleistocene (plai'siōsēn), a. (sb) Geol. [f. Gr. πλεῖστος most (superl. of πολύς much) + καινός new, recent.] Epithet applied at first to the newest division of the Pliocene or Upper Tertiary formation (as containing the greatest number of fossils of still existing species), also called Newer Pliocene; afterwards to the older division of the Post-tertiary or Quaternary, also called Post-Pliocene. Also applied to the animals, etc., of either of these periods. Also ellipt. as sb = pleistocene division or formation.

1839 Littell in Mag. Nat. Hist. New Sci. III 323 In the Appendix to the French translation of my 'Elements of Geology', I have proposed, for the sake of brevity, to substitute the term Pleistocene for Older Pliocene, and Pleistocene for Newer Pliocene. 1854 Bull. Mus. Hist. Nat. Paris III 46 The superficial deposits, or Pleistocene group, viz. all diluvial and alluvial deposits of gravel and other materials. 1862 Geikie, R. Forbes ix, 256 He states... that even the pleistocene, which is a subdivision of the pliocene, needs to be partitioned into a newer and older series. 1873 Geikie, G. L. Age xxx 423 The pleistocene hippopotamus. 1874 Littell, Pleist. Geol. x, 123 In former editions of this work I divided the Post-tertiary deposits into Recent and Post-pleistocene, but this latter term has many inconveniences. I have, therefore, determined for the future to adopt the name of 'Pleistocene', proposed by me in 1839 as a synonym for Newer Pliocene, but which, having been used by the late Edward Forbes as the equivalent of Post-pleistocene, has now passed into general use with that signification.

Sometimes applied to the upper part of the common membranous lining of the thorax and abdomen in vertebrates below mammals (peritoneum or pleuroperitoneum)

Plough, plow (plau), sb. 1 Forms: see below.

[Late OE. plōh (plōg), = ON plōgr (in Rigsmaal 10-11th c.); so Sw plug, Da ploug, plow; in OFris. plōch (Efris. plōg, Nfris. pluwge), MLG. plōch, plūch, MDu. ploech (Du. ploeg), OHG. pluog (MHG. pluoc, Ger. plug)—Teut. type plōgo-* or plōho-*, whence also Lombard Lat. plō(v)um, -us (Du. Cange), Lomb. plō, Tirol plōf plough. The regular OE. inflexion of plōh would have dat. plōge, gen. plōges, nom. pl. plōgas, giving in early ME. plōh, plōye, plōyes, later plowh, plowh, plowgh, pl. plowes; whence, by form-levelling, plough, ploughs, or plow, plows, the former the accepted spelling in England since 1700, the latter usual in U.S. In pronunciation, the final guttural was lost in some districts in 14th c., and has quite disappeared not only in the standard language, but in all dialects south of the Peak of Derbyshire; it remains in Scotland as χ, χ' (plouch, pluch = plux, plux'), and in the north of England is represented by f (pleuf, plew, pluf, pluf, pleaf, plif, etc. see Eng. Dial. Dict. s. v.). In PLOUGH v. (q. v.) neither gh nor f is pronounced.

As with path, peny, and other early p-words, in Teutonic, the origin of plōg, plōh, is involved in obscurity. Apparently the word was of late appearance. It is not found in Gothic, which used hōha, nor in OE. which used sulh, still retained dialectally, esp. in s. w. where plough is not used in this sense: see SULL, and cf. Eng. Dial. Dict. In Norse, also, the earlier name appears to have been arð, cognate with OS erda, f. vbl. 100t ar—to till, plough (see EAR v.), which survives in Norwegian as ar a small plough, perh. an earlier and simpler implemant than the plōg. The name is also found in Lith. plangas, and in the Slavonic langs. generally, OSlav. Serv., Russ. пługъ plug, Pol. plug, Boh. pluh; but these are admittedly from German.]

Plough-land, plow-land (plau'lænd) [f. PLOUGH sb. + LAND sb.: cf. OE. sullung, a derivative of sull plough, used in a similar sense in Kent and elsewhere. For the form, cf. ON. plogis-land (= plough's land), Sw. plogland an acre, and, in sense 2, Du. plogland, Ger. pflugland.]

1. Hist. The name used in the northern and eastern counties of England, after the Norman Conquest, for the unit of assessment of land, based upon the area capable of being tilled by one plough-team of eight oxen in the year: corresponding to the HIDE of the south and south-west (with which it was often equated), and, like it, embracing originally the meadow and pasture-land, and other necessary appurtenances of the holding.

In Domesday Bk. and other records in Latin, this unit is expressed by carrucata (= AF. carue, ONF. carue, F. charuée, CARUCATP) a derivative of carruca plough, while the hide is rendered hida. It is not possible to say whether 'plough-land' was a translation of carrucata or the converse, but we have no instance of the word before the end of the 13th c., and plough itself appears first in the 12th. The fact that the counties in which the carrucata was the unit of assessment are precisely those in which Danish influence prevailed, favours the theory that the plough land was of Norse origin; but there are difficulties. ON. plogis-land meant an acre, the normal area ploughed in one day. The extent of the normal plough-land, like that of the hide, is usually given as 120 acres, but in numerous instances it fell short of or exceeded this; the variations being prob due to attempts to make the areal plough lands correspond with the traditional assessment of the manors, to the inclusion or exclusion of the appurtenances and fallow land, and to local differences in the size of the acre.

The plough-land was divided into 8 ox gangs, as against the 4 yard-lands or virgates of the hide.
